

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

THE ISLAND OF YOUTH

BY THE SAME AUTHOR

Verses

SONGS, 1915

POEMS, 1916

THE QUEEN OF CHINA AND OTHER POEMS, 1919

Novels

THE OLD INDISPENSABLES, 1919

THE PEOPLE OF THE RUINS, 1920

THE ISLAND OF YOUTH

AND OTHER POEMS

by

EDWARD SHANKS

//

LONDON: 48 PALL MALL

W. COLLINS SONS & CO. LTD.

GLASGOW MELBOURNE AUCKLAND

NOTE

Many of the shorter pieces in this volume have already appeared in Land and Water, the London Mercury, the New Statesman, the Outlook, the Owl, the Spectator, To-day, and the Westminster Gazette. I am grateful to the Editors of these periodicals, not for permission to reprint, which was not theirs to give, but for having printed my verses in the first place.

E. S.

CONTENTS

FIRST PART

	PAGE
THE ROCK POOL	11
THE SWIMMERS	12
MEMORY	16
IN ANOTHER COUNTRY	21
THE GLADE	26
MORNING ON THE HILL	28
SONNET: Like someone bolted in a lightless room	30
TO THE UNKNOWN VOICE	31
TO THE UNKNOWN LIGHT	33
THE DANCER	35

SECOND PART

THE ISLAND OF YOUTH	39
---------------------	----

THIRD PART

	PAGE
THE SKY AT CAMPDEN	87
BOATS AT NIGHT	92
THE HARBOUR	93
SONNET: The dying man, whom all give up for dead	95
THE NIGHTJARS	96
DOVER'S HILL	100
THE EMIGRATION	101
STANZAS WRITTEN IN DEJECTION	110
THE SHADOW	113
A HOLLOW ELM	114
CONSTANTINOPLE	116
CHORUS FROM A TRAGEDY	127
THE END	133

FIRST PART

THE ROCK POOL

To Alice Warrender.

THIS is the sea. In these uneven walls
A wave lies prisoned. Far and far away Outward to ocean, as the slow tide falls, Her sisters through the capes that hold the bay
Dancing in lovely liberty recede.
Yet lovely in captivity she lies, Filled with soft colours, where the waving weed Moves gently and discloses to our eyes Blurred shining veins of rock and lucent shells Under the light-shot water; and here repose
Small quiet fish and dimly glowing bells
Of sleeping sea-anemones that close Their tender fronds and will not now awake Till on these rocks the waves returning break.

THE SWIMMERS

THE cove's a shining plate of blue and green,
With darker belts between The trough and crest of the lazily rising swell,
And the great rocks throw purple shadows down Where transient sun-sparks wink and burst and drown,
And the distant glimmering floor of pebble and shell
Is bright or hidden as the shadow wavers,
And everywhere the restless sun-steeped air Trembles and quavers, As though it were More saturate with light than it could bear.

Now come the swimmers from slow-dripping caves,
Where the shy fern creeps under the veined roof,

And wading out meet with glad breast the waves.

One holds aloof,
And climbs alone the reef with shrinking feet That scarce endure the jagged stone's dull heat,

Till on the edge he poises
And flies towards the water, vanishing In wreaths of white, with echoing liquid noises,
And swims beneath, a vague, distorted thing.

Now all the other swimmers leave behind
The crystal shallow and the foam-wet shore And sliding into deeper water find A living coolness in the lifting flood:
Then through their bodies leaps the sparkling blood,
So that they feel the faint earth's drought no more.

There now they float, heads raised above the green,
White bodies cloudily seen,

Further and further from the brazen rock
On which the hot air shakes, on which the tide Vainly throws with soundless shock
The cool and lagging wave. Out, out they go,
And now upon a mirrored cloud they ride
Or turning over, with soft strokes and slow, Slide on like shadows in a tranquil sky.
Behind them, on the tall parched cliff, the dry
And dusty grasses grow
In shallow ledges of the arid stone, Starving for coolness and the touch of rain.
But, though to earth they must return again, Here come the soft sea airs to meet them, blown
Over the surface of the outer deep, Scarce moving, staying, falling, straying, gone,
Light and delightful as the touch of sleep. . . .

One wakes and splashes round,
And magically all the others wake

From their sea-dream, and now with rippling sound

Their arms the silence break.

And now again the crystal shallows take

The dripping bodies whose cool hour is done;

They pause upon the beach, they pause and sigh,

Then vanish in the caverns one by one.

Soon the wet footmarks on the stones are
dry:

The cove sleeps on beneath the unwavering sun.

MEMORY

IN silence and in darkness memory wakes
Her million sheathed buds and breaks That day-long winter when the light and noise
And hard bleak breath of the outward-looking will Made barren her tender soil, when every voice Of her million airy birds was muffled or still.

One bud-sheath breaks:
One sudden voice awakes.

What change grew in our hearts seeing one night
That moth-winged ship drifting across the bay,
Her broad sail dimly white On cloudy waters and hills as vague as they?
Some new thing touched our spirits with distant delight,
Half seen, half noticed, as we loitered down,

Talking in whispers, to the little town, Down from the narrow hill —Talking in whispers, for the air so still Imposed its stillness on our lips and made A quiet equal with the equal shade That filled the slanting walk. That phantom now Slides with slack canvas and unwhispering prow Through the dark sea that this dark room has made.

Or the night of the closed eyes will turn to day
And all day's colours start out of the gray.
The sun burns on the water. The tall hills Push up their shady groves into the sky And fail and cease where the intense light spills
Its parching torrent on the gaunt and dry Rock of the further mountains, whence the snow
That softened their harsh edges long is gone

And nothing tempers now
The hot flood falling on the barren stone.

O memory, take and keep All that my eyes, your servants, bring you home—

Those other days beneath the low white dome
Of smooth-spread clouds that creep
As slow and soft as sleep, When shade grows pale and the cypress stands upright,

Distinct in the cool light,
Rigid and solid as a dark, hewn stone;

And many another night
That melts in darkness on the narrow quays
And changes every colour and every tone
And soothes the waters to a softer ease,
When under constellations coldly bright
The homeward sailors sing their way to bed On ships that motionless in harbour float.
The circling harbour-lights flash green and red;

And, out beyond, a steady travelling boat Breaking the swell with slow industrious oars
At each stroke pours Pale lighted water from the lifted blade.
Now in the painted houses all around Slow darkening windows call
The empty unwatched middle of the night.
The tide's few inches rise without a sound.
On the black promontory's windless head,
The last awake, the fireflies rise and fall
And tangle up their dithering skeins of light.

O memory, take and keep
All that my eyes, your servants, bring you
homel
Thick through the changing year
The unexpected, rich-charged moments come,
That you twixt wake and sleep
In the lids of the closed eyes shall make appear.

This is life's certain good, Though in the end it be not good at all

When the dark end arises
And the stripped, startled spirit must let fall
The amulets that could Prevail with life's but not death's sad devices.

Then, like a child from whom an older child Forces its gathered treasures, Its beads and shells and strings of withered flowers,
Tokens of recent pleasures,
The soul must lose in eyes weeping and wild Those prints of vanished hours.

IN ANOTHER COUNTRY

WHEN the lamp's guardian flame was out, he fell

Through dark abysses full of hollow sound, Through caves of sleep that murmured like a shell,

Till in night's furthest corridors he found,
Past any thought or feeling, his escape,
Where being loses shape,
Where sorrow melts and merges in profound Blackness, that is not pricked by any light.
There he found rest, how long he could not know,

In the deep middle of unfriendly night,
Safe in his stupor through the to and fro
Of the slow hours which strike and will not spare.
But sorrow's pack soon scented that dark lair,
And as he slept he knew that gradually Light grew around him, lifting veil by veil
The swathings of his hid security, Till darkness' self grew pale.

Whither he wandered in that middle land, Shining and silent, between sleep and waking, How should he tell? But yet he sees them stand,
Those calm and carven poplars, rising, breaking
Like frozen fountains the still, pearl-pure skies,
Sees, but not hears, the soundless aspen shaking
Over the long and lichened seat of stone
Where he awoke. He lifted heedless eyes Across the lawns and flower-beds overgrown Up to the house that crowned the terraces,
And down again, and saw the staring pond, Lucent and smooth and ringed with irises, The tall yew-hedge, the orchard trees beyond. . . .
All this, most strange, was strange beyond his care,
For grief attended him,
Moved like a wind soft fingers in his hair

And with her touch his burning eyes made dim.
And now his eyes dropped tears, and did not see

The glowing house, poised on the soft low sky,

The rich warm flowers that nodded silently Around him, or the birds in bush and tree That moved as noiseless as the clouds. But soon

Across the hush of that too quiet noon Something unseen yet drew his misty gaze To look for what he guessed not. So there came

Softly towards him through the garden ways
A girl in white. Like an unreal flame
A golden pattern played upon her dress, Which as he stared at her he knew to be Cast by the tears on his own eyelashes, Gathering softly and heavily.

Then as again his eyes were dimmed by tears
And with the falling echo of old fears

His heart was filled, he bowed his head and felt

Her sudden soothing hand upon his hair;
And moved by a strange reverence he knelt, Hiding his hot face in her hollow palms,
And laid upon her lap his vague despair,
Till as a mild wind risen at evening calms
The last black vapours from a tumbled sky,
Her touch serenely rolled away his care
And shed on him her own tranquillity.

A timeless moment thus he stayed and drew Peace from her hands and from her face unseen

And in that posture greater quiet knew Than ever yet his heart had found between The grinding wheels of wakefulness and sleep

Which day or night are full of restless sound, Laments of giants bound
Or lost birds crying on the lightless deep.
A moment—then the darkness of her hand

Grew thicker round his eyes and held no more
The warm reflected sunshine of that land . . .
Deeper and colder . . . and a shudder tore His waking body and a thin noise sighed Through a new darkness dense and terrible That blackened round him. 'Stay, stay, stay!' he cried,
Like the harsh notes of a storm-shaken bell.
But thicker all about the shadow fell,
Till with a pang he opened heavy eyes
On the beginning of a pale sunrise,
That flickered chilly on the lamp and bed.
Outside his window the sad aspen shook, Murmuring loudly, and its tapered head
The poplar sighing bowed. An early rook
In the stiff elm rehearsed the grating cry Which all the others answered back again.
Burdened by life and by a memory,
He rose to join the usual world of men.

THE GLADE

WE may raise our voices even in this still glade:

Though the colours and shadows and sounds so fleeting seem,
We shall not dispel them. They are not made Frailly by earth or hands, but immortal in our dream.

We may touch the faint violets with the hands of thought
Or lay the pale core of the wild arum bare;
And for ever in our minds the white wild cherry is caught, Cloudy against the sky and melting into air.

This which we have seen is eternally ours, No others shall tread in the glade which now we see;

Their hands shall not touch the frail tranquil flowers,
Nor their hearts faint in wonder at the wild white tree.

MORNING ON THE HILL

SOFTLY, softly, the long bare boughs are rubbed together, A dry leaf spindles down, like a bird's light feather.

Still, oh still—

Silence hath laid, in her woods and on her hill,

The sighing wind asleep,
And thin clouds smoke over, gently creep Across the bare furrows and rubbed grass and settle down,

Coiling in faint wreaths among the golden stones of the town.

Still, oh still! There is harm in speaking, Speech is too hard, speech only means waking Into a world of words where lovely things are bound by names,

Where we pursue colour and call her flowers or flames.

Yet speak if you will, or rather sing
As softly, softly as the bare boughs rubbed together, Make no more sound than touch of leaf or feather,
A song as vague as the mist-wreaths that cling Round the woods and the fields and the bare sides of the down
And the tall ghostly gleaming houses of the town,
A song that shall mix with silence, a faint escaping thing. . . .
Then, then we may find in the magic of this hour
Where it is thought is still, where the brain has no power
And words have no meaning except their sound.

SONNET

LIKE someone bolted in a lightless room, We search and stumble, and our flesh offend
On chairs and tables hidden in the gloom,
And pause, and start again, and in the end,
Legs bruised, hands torn, and minds bewildered, sink Till, huddling comfortless upon the ground, We wait for nothing, trembling when we think How in the darkness dark shapes hem us round.
And some a paper hold, which faintest light Silted between the shutters lets them see Dimly, and something written, black on white,
To tell them where the door is and the key.
But even those who see as much as this Still guess and cannot riddle what it is.

TO THE UNKNOWN VOICE

SPEAK once again, forgotten voice!
How, how gladly would I hear thee Guide my blind and mortal choice, Yet long months I come not near thee.
Whither hast thou then removed,
Or did I never hear thee ?
Was that whispering in the mind
Which with sense intent I divined Only the stir of blood in pulses aching ?
Hast thou never to my ear Stooped thy sweet mouth, my spirit waking ?
Speak now, if speak thou canst. The hot blood shaking Temples and arteries I know,
And in the loud confusion I shall know thee.
Speak and I will hear,
Heart, will and spirit all shall show thee.

Ah, no, no, no!
In the vast echoing cave

Floored by green earth and roofed by empty sky
Nothing but wind and wave
And no reply
Save vain reverberation of my cry.

Forgotten voice, speak, speak again,
Clearer than winds or waves or men.
Like a lost friend in countries far away, Thou hast been for so long a day:
Yet rise again, yet speak again to me;
I dwindle, wanting thee!

TO THE UNKNOWN LIGHT

IN the sad spirit
Where all is dark
And fault and merit
Are gray shapes stark,
Each like his neighbour
And each dim,
And pleasure and labour Alike are grim,
Shine down, O Light
Illumine this night.

Here in the gray
Nor motion nor breath
Nor joy of day
Nor sharpness of death Relieves the endless Pitiless gloom
Where goes friendless Desire to her doom:

Shine down, O Light,
Illumine this night.

I know thou livest,
 Then shine, then shine,
Thou that givest Help divine,
Turn on this cold Thy burning eyes
Ere starved and old
 The dark heart dies:
Shine down, O Light,
Illumine this night.

THE DANCER

BETWEEN the hither and the further woods,
On whose dark branches beats the sun in vain,
Out in the midst where the intense light broods,
There moves a livelier light, a living fire,
With speed that seems That still and sleeping radiance to disdain,
And yet no more to tire Than the quick shapes that haunt our happy dreams.

Light-skirted, feather-footed, laughing, dancing,
Borne on a breath of swift and buoyant air, Turning and sidling, retiring and advancing,
She moves like thistledown, she floats away, Swings and returns, lifts eyes to take the stare
Of the delighted watchers. Rise and sway

Her skirts about her; and now she slowly moves,
As though an unseen choir of singing Loves Hovered about her thrown-back head and cried
Delicious praise down to her smiling pride.
And every turn of her young body makes A silent changing music, fast or slow,
Which as she pauses breaks
And sinks upon itself in shining overthrow.
Silence unbroken follows the silent measure, The enraptured group that watched her quietly breathes
In the arrested silence of that pause An air filled full with the sweet scent of pleasure.
Then, as a swordsman slowly sheathes
The blade wherewith he wove a net of light,
So she in ordinary flesh withdraws
The coloured image, volatile and bright,
That danced before them and enchanted them.
Her arms fall softly to her sides,

Soft to the knee falls the skirt's airy hem,
The taut knees bend, the waist relaxes, swift Down on the grass the unstrung body slides.
She lies there huddled, hidden the flushed face,
Her shoulders heaving up the filmy shift,
One leg outstretched in spent, neglectful grace.

Low mutter they their praise that softly reaches The panting girl. She does not raise her head
But at the music of their grateful speeches
All her slack body comfortably glows And in ecstatic weariness she makes The sun-warmed turf a bed;
Her limbs fall looser, the soft eyelids close,
She sleeps. No voice her languid slumber breaks;
But now the watchers, musing deep and far,
Lift up their eyes

ARGUMENT

It was foretold by the oracle that Achilles, son of the sea-goddess, Thetis, and of Peleus, King of Thessaly, should have a glorious life but an early and violent death. When the Greek chieftains prepared their expedition against Troy, his mother, hoping to avert this doom, conveyed him to Scyros, where she hid him among the maidens of the island, disguised by her enchantments as one of them. It was also foretold that the Greeks should not take Troy without the help of Achilles, and Ulysses was therefore sent to find him out, which he did by means of a trick. During his concealment on the island Achilles loved Deidamia, the king's daughter, who afterwards bore him a son.

THE ISLAND OF YOUTH

To H. C. Harwood.

HARDLY the first sweet day of sun and showers

On which with dewy lashes the world awakes
And in the pale glass of the stretchèd sky, Misty with her own tears, sees blurred and dim Her half-forgotten youth—hardly that day Had stepped from troubled wave to quiet wave Before the maidens of the island learnt
They had a new companion. She was tall And fashioned with a grave and queenly beauty

Wherein the darkness of a grief to come Shone deep but lustrous, as upon the sand
Of shallow seas on clear and windless days
The shadow of the boat deepens, not flaws,
The watery light. She met them silently,
And when they asked her name she answered, Stranger,

But told not who had brought her there or whence.

All knew a lady had been deep engaged Through the whole day in secret with the king

And with the rustic lords who counselled him,

But none had seen her come or go. One said
There had been fluting in the morning wind And stir of waters and a breeze that ran Against the season's drift at touch of dawn
And strewed in the cool air a tingling music Like fingers playing on a glass's rim.

One said that in her father's house at noon She had passed the coolest chamber where the light

Through the rush-woven hangings never came,

And staying her bare feet by the shadowed entry

Had seen pale radiance lying in a pool
Upon the trodden floor, and faintly heard

Her father's voice answering another voice That uttered, like a wind on ruffling water, Delicate syllables. And in truth there was A presence on the island all that day
And all that night. The simple island lords, Who ruled a land as peaceful as themselves, Careful to have the granges full of corn,
The goat-skins plump with wine, the flocks and herds

Guarded and tended to a due increase, Showed in their eyes, like a reflected light, Serenity, and in their bearing peace,
And in their speech a cadence tranquil Than they had used before. Another told How the next day she had drowsed upon her bed

About the dawn, poised between sleep and waking,
And seen or dreamt (for when full morning
came

She knew not which) a rosy shape that drew Over the ripples to the sea's red verge,

Couched in a rosy shell, with dolphin-teams
And scaly-skinned outriders on the backs Of great sea-horses, blowing in resonant conches

A deep-breath'd tune, like noise of boisterous
waves

Which in full sunshine on a rocky coast Prolong their turmoil when the storm is done
And seem in play to mock their late assault.
While from her window these she watched,
she heard

A crying from wild ocean rise in answer
And saw the rosy shell fade in the dawn That flowered upon the sea. Or did a cloud, The sun's first messenger, dipped in his colours,

Melt in his fiery breathing as he rose ?
And was that clamour only the first wind That moves at dawn and from the light-thrilled air

Draws a faint melody ? She did not know,
For while she watched with elbows on the sill

Sleep soothed her eyes again. She woke to find

Sky, 'sea and light and air and nothing more,
Save in her thoughts a half-forgotten dream.

The island Scyros floated on the sea
And in the water shone her crags and towers,
A second self existing in the wave, Mysterious and lovely, like the double Which, as some yet believe for comfort's sake, Attends each man from birth to death, remaining

What in a kinder world he might have been.
But few in Scyros were the flaws and scars Which the transmuting mirror-sea might smooth,

And in that summer Thetis' blessing lay Especially upon her. Fishermen Thanked the sea-goddess for continual calm That lulled their storm-washed vessels near the rocks

And herded in their nets the plenteous fish.
The farmers watched their fields grow day by day

More fruitful, and the vines under the sun
More prosperously ripen to the vintage, Unvexed by creeping rot or summer tempest.
Nor wolf nor murrain did the shepherd plague And on his thyme-grown hills he slept at night,

Close by the dew-pond's green and glimmering round,

While all about him slept the peaceful flock Like white stones under the distant, kindly stars.

But not alone did the tame things increase For man's provision. In the dells and brakes
The vines that bear the wild tart fruit grew heavy

Early in summer, and along the ground Trailed with their load, not waving free in air.

And for the maidens there were many flowers,

Wild orchids rising in the broad-leafed grass
And pale wood-lilies lighting all the hills
And bells, as plenty as the ocean's fish, That seemed to run in shoals before the wind.

These were the island's wealth and luxury Wherewith gay summer filled her spreaded skirts.

A constant weather shed bright influence Upon the life of man, and day by day
The sea-wind blew unswerving, fresh and mild,

And on his airy billows bore the clouds
That sometimes melted in a fruitful shower.
But never was the earth with moisture soaked
To rot the full-eared corn in ripening month, Nor ever were the maidens from their tasks
In field or garden or on tawny beach, Or from the games that followed the light task,

By storms untimely or long rains withheld.
There is in maidenhood a subtle strength Reserved, as if a rift in mountains tall Should catch the waters of a hasty spring
And hold them peaceful in her lap of stone One moment, while the sky and leaning
 flowers
Are mirrored in the floods and make them lovely,
Before they hurry down the side again,
To grow, and take the soilure of their course,
Doing the work of water on the earth.
These that the island nourished needed not A goddess' blessing on the year to make them More beautiful, to round the child's thin limbs,
To ripen the lean side, and the slant breast Curve out in fullness. They were nature's foison,
The flower on mankind's tree, as brief as fair,

The foam-wreath on the restless tide of life,
Whose bubbles rise and break and rise again,
As fugitive and as eternal they.

And who beheld them, youth or graybeard worn

Or child or nursing-mother, felt in them
The magic moment when the race of man Poises in gathered strength before fulfilment And turns to beauty. Not least lovely there,
The Stranger, tall of limb and bright of eye And proud of carriage, joined them in their tasks,

Willing, and meek in answer when she earned Reproaches of the quicker-handed girls, And friendly in her looks, though on her brow

Cloudlike a constant sadness weighed, as if Knowledge mixed there with wonder. In their games

She was the better player. When they ran With skirts trussed up she outran them easily,
And she was quicker with the tossing ball.

Even their youthful leader she outstripped, Deidamia, daughter of the king,
Their fellow, though the daughter of the king,
And only by her beauty and her wit
The chief among them, who, till this the first In race and game, was by the Stranger's mien
Of gentleness and friendliness so pleased That earliest among them sprang her joy To greet the new companion and to guide Her steps unpractised in their well-known paths.

But after they had played one hour away Suddenly fear possessed them, and they shrank

From touching-her or being touched by her, Compelled by what strange chastity they knew not,

So that a soberness upon them fell And hushed their laughter, and their lifted arms

Bound to their sides and darkened their bright eyes.

It was as though a wandering god had plunged Deep fathoms from his castle in the sky
Into earth's thicker air and flying slow Had paused on shining-feathered vans to watch

So lovely a gathered garland of mortal flowers, Which—as the shadow of the hawk afield Frightens the birds to silence—so these maids Stilled in their merriment and turned to marble.
The game was stayed. The lightly bouncing ball

Bounced into rest upon the sunny ground
And lay there motionless. The ring of girls Stared each at other, dumbly asking whence
The influence came that thus affrighted them;
And none gave answer. Only in mockery Echo among the hills drew slowly away, Breathing soft repetitions of the laughter That long had ceased. A heavy silence lay Upon the plat of grass that late with sound Bubbled and overflowed. Then one by one,
Each loosed her still and rigid attitude;

One bent her waist, and one the attentive
head

Lowered, and one the stiffly pointing arm Let flex again. But still the silence brooded Over them all, as though they had been in truth

But rooted flowers, which have no other voice Save what the winds and ever-voyaging bees Create among their leaves. Thus from the depths

Of sense unconscious rose an airy thought To warn them of a peril not yet seen And nameless. But the Stranger gazed around

The troubled faces, hers grown darker still,
And raised her arms, as if imploring pity,
And slowly let them fall again. She saw,
One after one, the shadowed glances turn And rest on her in mute distrust. Then she Breathed deep a sigh of melody forlorn,
As sigh the woods when over darkening hills Come the first streamers of a storm foreknown,

And to the nearest, grown within that hour Her friend, who but that moment played with her

And with her made one moving form of grace, Addressed her sole appeal, silent and wan, Already hopeless. Deidamia gazed Down on the grass with veiled, unanswering look,

As though the life and friendliness that played
But lately on her lips and in her eyes
Like a wild wood-thing to some secret hole
At sound of footsteps in the wood were gone.
Not to the rest the Stranger raised her eyes
But staring downward hid the unusual tears
And with a strangled gesture of her hands Turned quick away. They saw her form recede

Among the olives, up the terraced hill,
The white skirt fluttering from step to step, Climbing the zigzag path. Then, all confused,

Again they essayed the interrupted game,

Took up the idle ball and listlessly Threw it from hand to hand. But as they played
The unknown influence that frightened them Surged newly bodied from the troubled depths Of maiden sense and trammelled their quick wrists
And hooded their clear eyes and in their thoughts
Dazzled like summer lightning faint and soft That ripens the green corn on starry nights.

Meanwhile on furthest mountain out of sight
The young Achilles, stripped of maiden's dress, Ran like a flame. Ant, spider, lizard, snake Paused in their busyness among the rocks
To see him go. Along the narrow path, Seldom by any trodden, overgrown With spiky bramble and the stinging nettle
And binding trails of many a creeping flower,

He leapt unheeding and his naked limbs Were coursed by rivulets of sweat and blood.
His teeth firm clenched, his nostrils open wide,

His eyes delighted by the wind he made,
He ran and ran untiring. Far below
The tiny people shrank to insect mould,
The sheltered harbour dwindled to a toy,
And soon the highest terraces of vines
Were left behind, and among burning crags
As naked as himself in joy he ran,
Till on the topmost rock where the last pine, Scorched by the summer, by the winter gales
At every gust unsettled, grimly clings To bare and dismal life, he paused and fell Headlong upon the stone and felt its roughness

Pleasantly hot against his heated flesh.
Then he knew nothing but content. His blood, That swept in race through every stretching vein,
Drowned the wild murmur of the lonely heart

With thunderous echoes in his bursting ears,
And the tired muscles of his youthful limbs Ached keener as he lay than did the thoughts That late perplexed his spirit. Soon, too soon,

The gasping breath grew calmer and the blood Ran not so hastily. Thus on a night, When loud gales shake the mountains and their shouts

Ring on in tumult through the echoing arches Of bursting heaven, no voice but theirs is heard;

But when they cease, when gradually the sky

Appeases her tempestuous children, then
Out of the spreading silence comes a voice
To take possession of the empty air, The still complaining brook, from shelf to shelf

Falling in thin-toned misery which seems To fill the listening world as not the storm.
Achilles wept. The sudden smarting tears

That sprang into his eyes astonished him;
And there, alone or watched by humble things In whose pure spirits reason was not quick To mock at grief, he let them fall unstopped And eased his suffering. But when he looked Down through the mist of olive-leaves and boughs

That clothed the mountain-side, the sea shone soft,

A smoky blue, whereon the sun's light glinted
And waves broke idly round a pointed reef.
Then on his knees he raised himself and stretched

Strong arms to the kind ocean, crying aloud,
' Mother, arise! Sweet mother, from the sea, Where with thy flowers the swell is garlanded, Arise and comfort me! Why was I born To suffer thus in exile? Must I dwell Far from my home among a foreign race
And exiled from myself in these false robes, Kept from the emulations of my youth,
Its triumphs, sports and dangers, like a girl?

Truly the oracle has injured me,
Not only now in seeing my young death,
But first when it ordained that Peleus' son Should have immortal substance in his flesh:
For who but one that hath unearthly power Could make that possible which should not be Or deceive any by so gross a trick?
Who but a goddess, moved by immortal wishes,
Could so mistake the human blood that runs
About my body, and my mortal wish Thus by divine unpitying logic thwart?'
Thus, thus he cried; and still no answer
came,
And still his bosom rose rebelliously,
And still with angry glances gazed he out Upon his mother's barren, lovely realm, His mouth awry, his cheeks, 'twixt rage and yearning, Fiery or wet. At last behind his back
The sun dipped underneath a neighbour peak

And suddenly the air was still and cool.
Below him far, a bird on bough unseen Raised a night anthem in sweet jets of sound,
And further still, beyond the edge of foam,
A little boat, as little as a leaf, Rocked on the falling swell, and from the bow
A kneeling fisherman dipped in the wave His knotted line and watched, with back intent,
While his companion with slow-moving oar Kept equal head against the gentle tide.

Thereafter, mild and grave and unaroused,
In female robes again the Stranger went Among the maidens with averted head
And did her tasks with them but not resumed
The sweet companionship of race and game.
And long long day added to long long day In summer's fragrant count. But all that year

The young in Scyros, like the trodden grass, Which, when the heel is lifted, lifts again
A green untamed head towards the sun, Seeing thus by plenty life's oppressive heel Raised for a season, raised themselves in joy And stretched out greedy hands to pick the flower

That might not blow again. But so it was That when the pot of pleasure came to boil Youth turned to maid and with persuasive lips

Demanded what she gave not. She, aloof, Passed by his prayer as though she heard it not,

And held in thought another, dimmer goal
Than such embraces as in earlier day Herself and him begot. For each to each, Working in pairs or resting through noon's
heat

Or waking double-bedded on airless nights,
The maidens owned, stumbling and wanting words,

How each was haunted by a misty shade,
Real but featureless. And, this confessed,
Each from her sister turned, repenting it,
To hide the blush that showed but chastity And yet seemed full of shame. And each alone Considered what her sister said, and dreamed That better she could see, although not say,
The vision far removed. But in their dances Ringed on the green and in their skipping games

A spirit ghosted them as not before And turned them from the joys of human maids

To bodiless imaginings. They grew
All through that summer like a race apart, Yet not the less fulfilled of grace and joy Which unknown longing lit to deeper hue, Like lightning playing in a distant cloud Whose edges still are bright with sunset's rose.

No more by garden, hill or lonely shore Deidamia led a romping train

To do their daily tasks or play or swim;
No more on island feast and holiday
She loosed them laughing in the happy crowd
To find new partners who their supple forms In game or dance with rougher grip might hold

Yet not in arms less loving. When the ship
Out of the uncharmed world beyond the rim Of visible ocean glided smoothly in, Unlooked for but most welcome, and the people

Came down rejoicing to the waterside
And ringed about the unknown voyagers, The maids, withdrawn behind the shouting folk,

Like clouds indeed, ranked in the upper sky,

That in their bosoms hold the needed rain, Aloof and lovely, wandered out of reach,
And like a summer cloud their shadow threw,

Cool but not dark upon the lively earth.

But soon to them, mustered beyond the throng,
Half hidden in the melting airs of day That deepened towards night on land and sea,
There came a voice, a strange appealing voice,
That moved them inwardly they knew not how,
And with the rustle and sheen of spreaded stuffs
Thrown on the grass, and many a gem displayed, Drew them to sidle through the crowd and view
The vessel's cargo. Long and long they gazed,
Charmed by the tongue that wove an airy web About their spirits; and the Stranger too, Drawn in among them, gazed with empty
eyes
On robes and scarves, till on the growing pile With careless hand and half-averted look

The merchant threw a sword. An ancient sword

Sank in a bed of softly yielding silks And lay there darkly gleaming. On the blade

Old grooves left keen and sharp the shearing edge:

The hilt, by many a hand-grip worn and smooth, Spoke the embrace of battling fingers clenched Often in noble rage or the desperate

Frenzy of beaten men who dreaded death

Or the cold iron will of slayers set Upon their fellows' end. These, like a swarm

Of ghosts that from the enchanter's eery glass

The unwary words call forth, rose from the blade

And steamed into the Stranger's smarting
eyes,

So that her own stretched hand she could not see

Which the hilt drew towards it. But her flesh

Felt that compulsion in the tendons fine
And in her veins again the blood at war, Desire with resolution, vow with wish, Storming between the unused banks. And then,

Unwilling and regretted, the gesture made Its own completion and an act was born,
Not ever from the world to be effaced
With all its consequence of deed and thought.
The hand that quickly from the hilt recoiled Could never be the same again, the nerves That henceforth should its fearful power direct

Were in their deep mysterious root transformed.

Nothing she cared who watched. Herself she saw

In her own spirit something rise and bud, Suddenly swelling, and the sheath of dreams Break into curling up and withered leaves To let that strange flower of the future through,
A blossom which with petals sombrely red

Presaged wild deeds, fruition of desire,
And after fruiting done a something else Dark to foresee but heavy with a sense Of weariness and blame and shame and tears.
This gloomed in her wide eyes and hid the scene,

Hid her companions, unawakened still,
Busy in dream with toy and ornament,
And hid the sideways glance that fixed on her In triumph. Hardly, when that voice began Low in her ear, like mutter of a stream Heard by the night-bewildered wanderer Deep in a misty wood, who knows the marsh Deadly to straying feet—hardly she knew Whence that doom-heavy soft persuasion
came,

From lips without or the unsuspected thought New-wakened in her heart with serpenttongue,

Calling the virgin spirit out of childhood To life and death and more than life or death.

Dumbly she listened, but as one who looks,
Not listens, with taut sense and straining
eyes,
Then with a muttered word, 'To-morrow!' turned Towards the mountain, where the tumbled crag
And huge still woods seemed in the darkening
air
To spread their darker selves and stain the sky With deeper hue about them. As she turned,
She saw with outward sight, that nothing sees, Another glance beseeching her. It passed As fades the bird's quick shadow on the field When a cloud overtakes it. Through the people
With stumbling feet and distant gaze she went.

This day was summer's harshest on the isle:
Her breath lay heavy in the stubble field

And field unreaped where stood the toppling ears
And every vineyard where the clusters gloomed, Full-globèd shadows in the still-hung leaves;
And every stone upon the shore rayed back Dull months-collected heat in stirless air Among the maidens. They about the show Still packed with swelling whispers and quick hands,
And felt slow moisture down their bodies run,
Stand on their foreheads and make lank their curls,
Till one raised up her eyes, and on her cheek
A faint breath smote with cold, awakening touch.
Low her voice sounded in the hubbub soft And yet so deep that each her whispering ceased
And looked, and saw upon the sea's far
edge
The sunset like a wavering curtain hung

To hide the unknown. Soft rose, smoky and soft,
Spread out across the sky a melting scroll And underneath, a cloud, loose-edged and dim, Rode on the water. Thence the wind blew chill,
Fingered their faces, pushed their tresses back
And laid the airy garments cold and close Against their shivering and reluctant flesh.
Away from them, alone, the Stranger paused High on the shoulder of the stony hill,
And looking eastward as they west, beheld At vision's limit, poised in crystal air, The phantom of a mountain-range, whose base Sprang out of vapour, but whose floating peaks Threw back in broken gold the sun's last light.
Dazzled she stood and stared. The mountains swam

Like rainbowed ice afloat on Arctic seas, Inpalpable, but sharp of edge and colour, One moment, and the next dissolved in shade,
Gone like a glowing cloud that winds disperse;
And darkness from that first drowned point came on,
Hurrying on to cover all the world.

Again Achilles laid upon the rock His maiden garments, now with sad contempt Yet something new of sorrow in the touch That needlessly made smooth their tumbled folds.

Then, like the rising of the winter sun,
Burning but sullen-hued, out of pale clouds,
The hero's body rose, from that eclipse For ever freed. Now up the deep ravines That clove the mountain, and the hollow
 paths

That scaled her flanks, flowed darkness like a tide

And the long grass streamed out invisibly Like seaweed under the slow-swelling wave.
Far from the fitful lights and voices loud Achilles came with heavy, lagging step Up the ascent. His feet the pollen brushed From pale, night-waking flowers and murmured on Through weeds by summer's heat made harsh and dry,

As though earth's spirit in the stillness breathed

A nervous deep unrest. Heavy he trod
And paused at every turning of the path
And took the next step upward with a sigh.
And often as he went he looked behind As though in quivering bough and air-tossed leaf

Were whispers of an unknown follower.
But closer still thought's dark pursuers came,
Spirits new waking and agog to form

Themselves strong bodies from the smoking blood

His hand was now to spill, and from his own That after must be spilt. At last he stayed Under an olive-tree and sinking down Bowed his hot forehead into cramped hands, Feeling a little world whose pulses beat Like earthquakes or annihilating wars.
About his seat the creatures of the night Sought each a weaker, and the ancient rocks Saw many a scene of tiny battle and death.
After an hour was gone he raised his head, Hearing, he thought, once more below the
crag

The quiet water washing on a reef Which in the silence grew, until it seemed,
Close in his ear, but in no human tongue, A gentle voice speaking strange words of peace.

'Mother,' he cried, 'it is your voice. O use The speech I know!' No answer came to him:

But when the echoes of his cry had fallen Like stricken birds from dark crag to dark
sea,

He spoke again: ' Mother, was it from this You hid me, not my own longings, my own dreams ?

These were the deeds I dreamt of—to make cause

With the shrill cuckold for the magic harlot And slay innocent men! Now I can see What it is that must die before my death, Eaten at the root before the arrow strikes.

I cry to you as not before, for then I accused the kind, unknowing deity That saw the motions of my human heart
As I have watched the toad's dull pulsing throat

In ignorance and love. Now I implore Your strength against the thing you feared for me!

For this dark fate that points out the forked way

Loves not nor hates, but knows, and in my brain

Has sown a dreadful guessing. Shall I become An airy bubble, empty, round and gay,
That leaves not even a stain upon the earth, Or the gross meat which day by day my fellows

Pass through dishonouring stomachs for their food ?

How should I choose between them if I must ?
Yet as I speak my choice is made.' The sea, Moaning about the eternal base below,
Spread through the air a voice of sad assent That gripped his heart and in the grip gave peace,
The peace of things resolved, not to be changed.

Deep grew the darkness where he stood.
The moon,
Arising softly from a couch of cloud, Lightened the hillside here and there, and cast

On every shadowed place a thicker shade.
Within that veil Achilles stood obscured, Numb at the heart, but all Achilles now,
For now from him a last enchantment fell, Leaving him strong and sad. Out of the world

Faded at last the semblance he had borne, Vanished as vanishes a happy dream
Which at the menace of inbreaking day Still shields the sleeper from the cruel sun.
Gone was the Stranger. Whither? Ask as well

Where the flower's beauty goes when petals fade

And the rough seed thrusts out. Yet it may be That still a spirit haunts the isle, a ghost
Of dew and light and air, revisiting
The beach where long ago the maidens played,
And finds perhaps in some far, narrow vale
The rude grave of a poet, dead too young, Whom death, or life, frustrated of his hope, Presses her faint lips to the soil and breathes

One word of half-remembered sisterhood.
But these are dreams. Out of the breathing world

Long, long ago that semblance fled away,
Past any summons, even of the sweetest mouth To which it once had answered. Now in vain

Those patient feet climbed the rough path, in vain

Deidamia through the olive-trees, A slip of white that dimly drifted on Like sunshine pale in sea-abysms drowned, Searched groping and astray. In vain she called,

Bidding the lost companion answer her—
Too late the summons spoken to a wraith.
Yet a receding whisper trembled out
As though the air had spoken or the leaves Had lent a voice to the unbodied spirit
To breathe an inarticulate farewell.
Gladly she answered and again came on And by the darkness where the hero stood,

Only a shadow paler than the rest, Troubled that shadow with her gentle plea:
'Why do you shun us, Stranger? Have we not Long since repented, though in looks not words,
The wrong we did you? We were cruel and strange,
Knowing not why, not knowing we were so,
But moved by something hidden in ourselves That never stirred before. It was not unkindness Turned me from you and soured my friendly heart
But kindness too sudden in my breast. O say, What serpent raised its head 'twixt you and me
And stung the hands held out in growing love?'
She paused, and in her voice the tears welled high Like an encroaching wave that fails again Before the brink. 'Why are you strange to us?
What wakes in us a thing so long unknown

To sudden aching life ? Before you came We lived together, maidens without thought,
As though the rolling world its axle stayed And time forebore to trouble us. But now The emblems of our dream grow real and harsh,

Our peace becomes a smarting restlessness.

Return to us, return, and we with games
And gentle love will woo you to ourselves And all shall be with us as once it was.
Will you not come with me ? Can you not give

Again what I at first refused ? ' He stood As rigid as a cypress-tree at noon When all the mountain sleeps and on her side

The woods are breathless. Then with painful cry

At one step from the thicket he advanced
And in the moonlight tall and naked appeared, Saying with harsh, loud voice, ' I am Achilles ! '

Whereat the girl moaned low, shrinking aside,

And all life's terror flickered in her gaze.
He bent his straining body down to her,
She winced away still more on powerless knees,

And thus they stayed unmoving. The night stilled

Her wandering airs and every jiggling leaf Hung quiet on the stalk. Nothing was heard, Save from the girl a deep and labouring breath
That broke into a sob and died away
And left a quivering horror in the darkness
When silence rose about the frozen pair.

Until at last Achilles spoke again,
Like thunder speaking on the cloudy hill
To dwellers in the valley far below, Distant, deliberate and dreadful. 'You Shrink now from truth as once from lies. I have looked

Truth in the face and seen a fearful thing,
Not what we think—yet I am not afraid.'

He ceased. Again the echo died. The girl Raised her sunk face with wrung and questioning look,
As though upon his breast was written a word,
Where the hard answer to all questions lay,
Which she spelt slowly out. Upon her brow
The weight of unexpected knowledge grew,
As harsh a weight to carry as may be In mortal womb the progeny of a god.
Yet never did the proud and stem-straight neck
Sway at the burden; and in those wide eyes Horror gave way to wonder, wonder drew in A sharp and dolorous ecstasy. At last He, bending down, another answer read To his own cry. There was in their embrace No kindness nor no pleasure, but the strength Of floods unloosened, as their spirits rose Dizzy and blind through the void fields of night.

O stars, shine kindly on them, and, dark earth,
Breathe all your thick and friendly odours up About their bed, the smell of well-dunged fields
Ready to bear new harvests and the smell Of cattle stalled in comfortable byres, Mixed with the keener scents of transient
flowers,
That drift, a natural incense, on the hills;
And you, dim forest on the mountain side, Receive among the noises of the night
That cry of bodily pain and let it fall Into the silence with the fox's bark And scarce-heard whimper of the netted hare.

When the slow morning came, the crawling
sun
Appeared behind a heavy bank of cloud
And threw a gray and level flood of light

Towards the island; and the hero's arm Threw a distincter shadow on the breast That panted soft beneath it into peace.
He raised himself a little, and with voice That dawn's mysterious hush made thin and still

Murmured, 'The night is over, I must go!'
Then with convulsive grasp of his strong
arms

He raised her to him, and his anxious mouth Sought on her quiet lips, cold cheeks, dark lids,

A further tenderness night had not shown.
He found not what he sought, or, if he found,
Found also in that sweet such bitter taste As checked the crowding kisses. Through his tears

That ached unshed he saw her resting body Blurred with unsteady light. He closed his eyes

And in his heart wild lamentation rose,
A jarred and dissonant music that bewailed

Their two defeated lives. O for the world Of dreams and unawaked enchantment still!
Already on her smooth brow and lineless cheeks,

Forewritten in a ghostly character,
Age, sorrow and deception and the shame Of hopes forsaken grinned at him. He knew,
His loth flesh crawling at the touch, that now
The hateful pencil wrote upon his skin
Its mocking message—not the same, for age Had no part in it. This was truth indeed, Which he had seen, he boasted, without fear,
But dim and veiled, not in particular shape.
He winced unbearably, his spirit felt,
Grinding and harsh, the stirring of that truth,
Too like the pangs of motherhood which soon Deidamia's body must convulse, Being to her then, deserted and alone,
The sole remembrance of this night, their love.

He groaned, but at the sound she raised, her
eyes,

Answering him only with a long, slow look Deep in his own, which gazed at her and shed Their burning hunger and unrest, until They mirrored pure the mournful peace of hers,
The peace of things fulfilled, deep beyond joy.

May Day, Portofino

—Christmas Day, Lewes, 1920.

THIRD PART

THE SKY AT CAMPDEN

To Eleanor and Alec Miller.

FOLD after fold, the smoky clouds come over
The western edge,
Sag, lift and sink and at last discover
A long thin strip of delicate blue sky.
Sharp drawn against it, the thin hedge Upon the hill-top and the high Unstirring groves of trees
First catch the sun as the clouds go over, Sailing eastward to uncover
The airy width of blue.
And all the fields above and here all these Shine green and golden, slowly fade
And in the shadow lose their burning hue, Where grass and leaf and corn one hue are made,
And faintly, gradually glow again
As the sun takes them
Or shudder, veiled in the darkly gleaming rain,
Or ripple over as the wind shakes them,

Turning a new face to the skeltering air, Lovely in light or rain or shade,
In any weather inalterably fair.

Here the sky hangs so closely overhead,
From Dover's Hill to Blockley, a canopy spread Roofing the valley with a changing light, Where, underneath, long roads, winding and white,
Toil up the hill-sides to approach the sky,
Where the small town and all its villages lie, Ruled and completed by the blue above.
And here the clouds that elsewhere distantly move,
Aloof, remote from human care or love,
Share in our daily life, no further away
Than the old elms or the warm ricks of hay,
And the sky is scarce stranger than the grass we tread,
And the rain falls softer, kindlier here
Than in other places out of the austere

Hard heavens, wherefrom the traveller bends his head.

Other skies are strange. We have been where

Earth's friendliness grew thin in the cold air
And the small houses clung to the hill-side And the restless wind in gaunt trees muttered and cried

As it fled on. Not so this charmed air
That softly steals by thicket and grove
With the low voice and the tender hands of love,
Or races laughing across the fields and throws Stones and soft grass and flowers lightly
down

Where, like the bared heart of a dying rose,
In all its golden beauty glows the town.

And sometimes in the evening all's dove-pale,
When the day-weary breezes fail
And halt to make the valley a fold For their far-driven flocks of cloud. We see The cloudy edges of the lifted wold

Melt in the gray and fade in mystery.
Once rising early we beheld Against dawn's pure and quiet western sky, Poised in the airless branches of the tree, A glowing apple night's thick dews had swelled
To sudden ripeness, the first, no neighbour
 by.
And once a burning haystack in the dusk Lit up the valley, and all the people came From the deeper night around, from the sombre husk
That burst to show this crimson fruit of flame;
And the tall fire rose into the sky and cast Reflections and pale twilights far away,
And on the passing clouds a mimic day
That faded as they passed.

Draw back the curtain, throw the window wide!
Midnight. Round love's own dwelling, where we dwell,

Silently, softly those great presences glide, Nothing their track to tell,
Save where the staring, pin-point stars go out;
Still overhead they slide
In slow benigance folding us about.
Love, draw the curtain again and we will sleep:
Let the friendly sky and the clouds our vigil keep.

BOATS AT NIGHT

HOW lovely is the sound of oars at night And unknown voices, borne through windless air,

From shadowy vessels floating out of sight
Beyond the harbour lantern's broken glare
To those piled rocks that make on the dark wave

Only a darker stain. The splashing oars Slide softly on as in an echoing cave

And with the whisper of the unseen shores Mingle their music, till the bell of night Murmurs reverberations low and deep That droop towards the land in swooning flight

Like whispers from the lazy lips of sleep.
The oars grow faint. Below the cloud-dim hill

The shadows fade and now the bay is still

THE HARBOUR

INTO your heart as into harbour home,
A flagging ship with furling sails, I come.
There round the haven stand immortal trees,
Rank upon rank, in sun-steeped terraces,
And in the water, still and blue and deep,
Their images and the ship's in quietness sleep;
And there the air is calm, is pure and bright,
Sweet to the nostrils, full of slumbering light,
So crystal-clear that all the shadows stand,
Sharp-edged, distinct, alike on sea and land.
There peacefully at anchor the ship lies, Dreaming and still, where only change the skies
From noon's pale glow to night's profounder blue,
And radiance reigns the day and night-time through,
Whether the sun's light, or the moon's, or star's,
Falls on the deck and on the quiet spars.

THE NIGHTJARS

ALL day the cuckoo has sung his double cries,
Far in the woods and hidden, or close but not seen:
Once he flew overhead and we heard the sound rise
In the song's space and die in a thicket
green.

All day the blackbird has sung with the thrush
And the nightingale, though we heard him not clear,
And others chirped and murmured from bush to bush,
Loud, soft, shrill, uncertain, far and near.

Now on the dark hill, after that tumult of song, Silence settles down, a step before night, While on the ground and in the trees and all along

The widespread horizon slowly dies the
light,

Like a rainbowed fish held dying in the net,
With last lovely flushes to the final gray;
And over the black hill a soft wind blows yet, Carrying on wide wings the last light away.

How immense the silence! So a fountain falls, When the jet fails, with a last scattered spray,
And the wind goes on, as the settling thrush calls,
Carrying on soft wings the last echoes away.

Step by step, slowly, we climb the silent hill, Speechless, almost frightened. As the path wheels round Into an open glade where the grass is hushed and still,
Warmth rises sudden and startling from the ground.

The trees merge and melt in the fading gray
sky,
And now from tree or bush, we cannot tell
where,
A thin sound arises, faintly, haltingly, Stops to take breath and then fills the quiet
air

With a hoarse, sweet music. Thereon, all around,
All the other nightjars join in the whirring song,
And, as we pause to hear, the shadowy trees resound Till the whole vague hill-side is filled with the throng,

Singing louder and louder. But all at once
The chorus gives way to the sweetest voice,
A single and lonely singer, whose unchanging
runs Charm our ears with magic, monotonous
noise.

He pauses. We seek him; but the song once gone,

There is nothing to show him. We clap hands in vain.

Now over the crest a new faint song is begun,
That we can hardly hear. Is it he again ?

And as we halt, doubtful, in the darkness growing

Thicker and stranger round us, full of mysteries,

With the first night airs upon our faces blowing,
A dark shape flaps out from the invisible trees,

And slides across our path, a moving clot of
night,

His wings knocking loudly as he flies along, Startling the stillness. And he fades out of our sight

And in his shadowy thicket resumes the song.

DOVER'S HILL

To F. L. Griggs.

FROM this hill where the air's so clear
We can see away and away,
And the villages, far as near,
Shine in the lucid day.
On rough short grass we tread
And thistles bend at our feet
And a lark sings overhead
And the clouds are white and fleet.
The wind is strong in our faces,
It drives us, we veer and yield,
And a broken thistle-top races
Over the tossing field;
But below, as we look around,
The deep long plains appear Like a lost country drowned
In a tranquil flood of air, Whence now and again there rises
To the listener on this shore
The muffled sound of the voices Of bells that ring once more.

THE EMIGRATION

BEFORE dawn, under the windless mountains, the people Came from their villages, assembling clan by clan, Through the last hours of night over black dusty roads Trailing reluctant feet, driving the slow waggons, Men, women and children in the cold dusk confounded.
Hardly came a ray of light from the muffled sky, Hardly in that still dawn a sound from quiet air, Only the endless murmur of feet shuffling on,
The sobbing of tired children, and a woman's tears Held in her bosom like a stream trickling in darkness,

And a young man's quickened breath that made no more Than a puff of white on the chill air. Night was long,
That night in the valley, and all the winds were still.
Slow and unseen came the first ascent of the road
That led to the hidden pass and another world.
Here first the way grew stony, here first the feet
Of the weaker stumbled and were bruised, here the pebbles Slipped under aching soles and wrenched the careless ankle;
And now from summits yet in darkness unknown,
From snowy slopes and dizzy ice-belted peaks, Stole, with the louder sounding of the waterfall,
A still wind hardly moving whose gentle breath

Crept through woollen cloaks like the trickling of water.

The king, their leader, daunted his stout stallion

And drew into a rocky cleft whence he watched The sad procession winding upward in silence, Marked every drooping shoulder that bore a spear

And every woman that held in cramped arms
A child to her breast and every walking child That whimpered and stumbled. He saw them all

Though gray through the gray night they drooped and stumbled.

When the last had gone he turned and rode downwards,

Carefully, leaning back on his horse's haunches, And before him unseen, like messengers in haste,

Plunged the rattling stones dislodged by the hooves.

On the flat land he first saw the growing light That hovered on the swift stream rustling beside him,
Ice-cold, ice-gray, endlessly tossed and heaved
In small blunt waves, as down from the glacier, Hung aloft still in night, it fled to the valley, There to grow calm, to grow smooth and peaceable,
Spreading in reedy brooks through the water-meadows
Where the tadpoles thicken the stream and the dragon-flies
Mate in late spring on their dizzy flights.
Here the king paused as the twilight brightened.
Light swelled as into an aching head comes sleep, Thus unknown, unperceived, but steadily growing Till the near fields were distinct and the nearest farm
Plainly to be seen, with byre, barn and sheds,
And there on the dung-heap a lazy cock Moving sluggish wings and lifting his head.

And the light grew. And, beyond, the land was revealed,
Pastures and grain and the scattered houses Over which the elms spread out their broad branches;
And further beyond rose the desolate hills Covered with stubborn bushes, bracken and wiry grass,
And the poisonous green marshes that lay in their hollows,
Bounding the narrow valley with an iron wall.

So, since the valley was narrow and close-bounded,
A circle of fruitfulness hemmed in by the unfruitful,
Since the quiet race brought forth ever more children,
Sons must leave their fathers, daughters their mothers,
The quiet be the unquiet and stay-at-homes be wanderers.

No words came to the king's lips. He gazed around him,
Dumbly regarding the land where his brother to-day Ruled in his place. Far away his eyes travelled Seeing the first smoke rising from a farmhouse
Twenty feet untroubled in the motionless air.
They are rising, he whispered, the wife has lighted
Their fire and the husband pauses in the door
To look at his cattle grazing in the meadows.
So have we all; and when we are gone
Still every morning the fires will be lighted, Men will go to the fields and bring in the crops.
In the cool dark barn where my oats were gathered,
Where I rested on the heap and took soft handfuls
Of the smooth hard grain that ran through my fingers,

This year my brother will gather his oats
And coming in tired from walking his fields, Dazed with summer's glare, will throw himself down

On the yielding heap and hear the whispering Of the flowing grain that trickles round his body

—Next year as well, and many, many years.

The light grew strong: it was now full morning.

He turned his horse and rode like a storm
After the marching people. Up the steep track The horse's strong shoulders forced the ground behind him,

Plunging and pulling. The blue sky above Grew brighter and colder: with a rush of cold waters

The torrent hurled downwards in its narrow channel.

On the high shoulder of the wind-swept mountain

The track turned round and beyond the corner

The king in his haste found the people halted,

Below them the abyss—and the shelving path

Stretched narrow and treacherous into the distance.

Strung out along it, huddled and comfortless, They made their poor breakfast. Their sullen eyes

Looked only at the hard stone beneath their feet,

Not backwards or forwards. But a group of women

Clustered at the edge with gestures and sad
cries,

And in the midst of them a silent woman Stared into the gulf. For she was the mother Of the first that died, of the child whose foot Had turned on a pebble, throwing him over,

Down, down, down, bouncing from ledge to ledge.
There now his body, spread-eagled on the rubble,
Alone, abandoned, waited vultures and wolves.
The king rode past, saying nothing. His grim lips
Were frozen hard by pain and love of his people.
His hard bleak eyes stared onward where the ribbon-path
Vanished in the waste of the tumbled snowy mountains,
Peak after peak and chasm after chasm, Mercilessly lighted by the cold lucid sun.

STANZAS WRITTEN IN DEJECTION

HOW then, my dark and empty spirit, Wouldst thou employ these brooding days?
The senses lose their trivial merit,
The sky grows chill, the rose decays;
We see no more what we have seen,
We are not now what we have been.

Thus in the middle of her season
Sometimes the flowering may doth fade.
Who knoweth by what inner treason
Her rich adornment is betrayed?
Now as the blossom from the tree
So falls my old content from me.

I cannot tell what saps me so
And takes enjoyment from my mind:
I only see the bright months grow Duller or my weak eyes more blind.
This year hath ousted from my breast Joy for a dark and vague unrest.

I read in some forgotten story
How in the mountains of the west,
Where the calm sea in sun-flecked glory
Under the snow-peaks lies at rest,
The dying eagle seeks a place Where a great wind drives up in space;
And there though from his failing wings Motion has gone with joy and strength,
On the ascending stream he swings
Into the sky and sees at length
On the warm current soaring high
The ledge where first he learnt to fly,
The valleys where of old he preyed,
The eyries where he dwelt and loved,
That eyrie where his nest was made,
Which long the tempest hath removed—
In his ascent he sees these things And needs no motion of his wings.
And still up-borne he rises higher
And fades from his companions' sight,

Lost in the sun's descending fire, Floating amid a sea of light—
Would that we too, when pleasures fail, Could find at last that mighty gale!

Would that we too, no effort making,
On such a current could aspire, Through the thick air and cloud-wreaths breaking
Into the heights that we desire,
There in a lonely still delight
To float upon a sea of light!

THE SHADOW

DEATH, would I feared not thee, But ever can I see Thy mutable shadow thrown Upon the walls of Life's warm, cheerful room.
Companioned or alone,
I feel the presence of that following gloom,
Like one who vaguely knows Behind his back the shade his body throws—
'Tis not thy shadow only, 'tis my own!

I face towards the light That rises fair and bright Over wide fields asleep,
But still I know that stealthy darkness there Close at my heels doth creep,
My ghostly company, my haunting care;
And if the light be strong Before my eyes, through pleasant hours and long, Then, then, the shadow is most black and deep.

A HOLLOW ELM

WHAT hast thou not withstood, Tempest-despising tree,
Whose bloat and riven wood Gapes now so hollowly, What rains have beaten thee through many years, What snows from off thy boughs have dripped like tears ?

Calmly thou standest now Upon thy sunny mound;
The first spring breezes flow Past with sweet dizzy sound;
Yet on thy pollard top the branches few Stand stiffly out, disdain to murmur too.

The children at thy foot Open new-lighted eyes
Where on gnarled bark and root
 The soft warm sunshine lies—

Dost thou upon thine ancient sides resent
The touch of youth, quick and impermanent ?

These at the beck of spring Live in the moment still;
Thy boughs unquivering,
Remembering winter's chill
And many other winters past and gone, Are mocked, not cheated, by the transient
sun.

Hast thou so much withstood, Dumb and unmoving tree,
That now thy hollow wood Stiffens disdainfully Against the soft spring airs and soft spring rain,
Knowing too well that winter comes again ?

CONSTANTINOPLE

I suddenly realise that the ambition of my life has been—since I was two—to go on a military expedition against Constantinople. . . . This is nonsense.—Letters of Rupert Brooke.

Still it waits redeeming.—James Elroy Flecker.

FIRST VOICE

NO more, they say, the Host is raised in that Cathedral which was mine.

SECOND VOICE

Like you I too beneath that dome have eat the bread and drunk the wine That's banished thence, but not like yours my empire shook at last and fell And then I died upon the walls built by another Constantine.

FIRST VOICE

All's changed, they say, all's changed within that lovely and most sacred shell,

And where dark unbelievers pray no more the holy eikons shine.

SECOND VOICE

I do not know. I do not know. When I went out to fight that day My starving people filled the streets and cheered me thinly on my way.
Behind me lay the Christian town, before me stood the infidel;
And they were many, we were few—I know no more but that I fell.
I could not see or hear or ask, my face being masked with blood and clay.

FIRST VOICE

Byzantium was proud and strong. When war and fire had struck and ceased, To build her lovelier than before I took the treasures of the east.
A thousand cunning artists worked on floor and pillar, porch and dome,

In marble and in precious stones to make the Holy Wisdom's home;
And there when all the toil was done I knelt and prayed, I bowed my head, Knowing that now Byzantium was royal as the elder Rome.

SECOND VOICE

And is the Holy Wisdom fled since that fierce creed rolled o'er my head ?

FIRST VOICE

The heathen prays where once we prayed, now that both you and I are dead.
Poor fallen king, nine hundred years from me to you the city stood And seven centuries her walls were washed in vain with Moslem blood, An angry tide that rose to flood and boiled and stormed and ebbd again, Where like a torrent in the sea the blood of our own Greeks was shed.

SECOND VOICE

So deep I fell in my defeat, the centuries that wax and wane
Have passed like shadows on the grave wherein I lie and do not know How many years are gone since then, how fares it with your sacred fane.

FIRST VOICE

I am a shade no less than you—thin rumours reach us here below.
How should I tell what falls on earth and how the tides of battle flow ?
Yet it is said the Christians go against the heathen in our seat Though four long sullen centuries have left unanswered your defeat.

SECOND VOICE

There were young men who fought with me, who stood with me upon the walls - Would in this waste of empty time that somewhere they and I could meet!

They were my brothers and my friends who fought to keep the city free,
And I would take their hands again . . .
something within me stirs and calls . . .
O God, Whose house I fought to save, send back my ancient friends to me, They who were bound by the same bond and died in armour as I died!

FIRST VOICE

Who is it comes ?

SECOND VOICE

In this lone place what younger shadow wavers near ?
None of my friends could find me here, the wastes of hell are dark and wide,
And yet . . . and yet . . .

FIRST VOICE

Who are you ? Speak! We are two shades and nought to fear.

THIRD VOICE

I died a soldier.

SECOND VOICE

I as well. Come, brother, closer to my side.
How come you, from what battlefield, what banners had your enemy?

THIRD VOICE

I was a poet, I was young, a northern island gave me birth, I knew and loved my fellow-men, I knew and loved the lovely earth, Yet in my youth I married death and gave my life without a sigh, Gave all the love I bore and had, came to the eastern sea to die.
My foes were yours.

SECOND VOICE

The tale is true! Still they oppose the infidel!

FIRST VOICE

God's mercy hath designed an end—speak on, young soldier, you speak well.
Tell us how Christian arms again were carried up the Golden Horn And how again the Christian cross was planted on our citadel.

THIRD VOICE

I died before, I lay alone, my comrades stormed the beach and hill, But where the earth was red and torn, my wistful spirit followed still.

FIRST VOICE

I heard the thunder of that war, an unknown thunder strange to hear, Beat like a wave on Islam's shore, like doom within the Sultan's ear.

SECOND VOICE

O brother, speak! You died before, but still you saw the army go

Between the city's holy walls and drive the heathen from our throne.

Brother, upon those walls I fell, I fell four hundred years ago,

Tell me——

THIRD VOICE

Within my valley-grave I felt a peace till then unknown,

Happy I had not died in vain nor those who died away from me . . .

FIRST VOICE

He pauses and his voice is lost, the fire of speech is drowned with tears.

SECOND VOICE

O new companion, speak again, we have waited here so many years!

THIRD VOICE

In life I had loved earth so well, the ties of earth and flesh were strong,

And after I was laid in earth Scyros the island held me long, Till on a day the rumour came that sent me here below to you, Sickened of earth by grief and shame to know my childish dream untrue.

FIRST VOICE

What is the news you strive to tell? Has the first Mass not yet been said Beneath the dome where once I knelt and bowed a proud imperial head?

THIRD VOICE

No Christian stands beneath that dome to eat the bread or drink the wine, No Mass has there been said or sung, but praises in a heathen tongue To those who gave the Turk again the sacred walls of Constantine.

SECOND VOICE

We died in vain, my friends and I.

THIRD VOICE

My friends and I have died in vain.

FIRST VOICE

Nought given in the city's cause is wholly lost. The walls remain.

O raise your heads, my friends, and know that while the soaring dome shall stand.

Though heathens hold it for a space the city still is Christian land,

And though the years we wait be long and black the deed and deep the shame,

Yet still shall hope burn like a flame while Christian hearts and swords are strong.

O youngest friend, have peace awhile: though you should wait as long as we,

The life you gave was not in vain and you shall see the city free.

Note.—This poem was written in February, 1920, on reading the announcement that Constantinople was to be handed back to the Turk. .The three speakers are Justinian, Constantine Palæologus and Rupert Brooke. The verbal reminiscences of Flecker are, of course, deliberate.

CHORUS FROM A TRAGEDY

HOW wonderful the world, how wonderful the race

That binds with rails her savage earth, that rides her skies,

That in the sun's inflamed or the moon's tranquil face

Wets her wild soil with tears and lives and loves and dies!

Men have not ceased from toil since first they went upright,

Their ships traverse the seas, their bridges span the streams,

They harness fire and water and create power and light,

They have overcome the earth in the intervals of dreams.

Long has their struggle been, diverse the deeds they do,

Harsh is their enemy, bitter the wounds they bear;

How many of their sons the merciless water slew,

How many died by fire or tumbled from the air ?

Still inch by painful inch the reluctant world is won,

The mountain's entrails pierced, the highest summit trod,

And against deadly rain and the uncertain sun

Each year the crops are wrenched from the unwilling sod,

And houses piled on high that from earth's flesh are made,

Beasts bound and tamed and taught to be the slaves of man;

And men arise and burn with lofty hope and
fade,

Leaving their sons advanced towards heaven a little span.

Yea, were not this enough, to have struggled with the earth,
To have seen their fellows die by famine, fire, and plague,
To have seen their women anguish in the pangs of birth,
To have known all these brave souls lost in the lightless vague ?

But man aspires past death, hungers beyond the flesh, Dreams of he knows not what, a vast and shadowy thing, Forgets his fight with earth and strives to break the mesh Even of his own desires, and spread a huger wing,

Forgets his fight with earth, turns from the sullen foe, Leaves the far seas uncrossed, the forest still unpathed,

Lays by his spade and gazes where the high clouds go Or idly broods above the sea by moonlight bathed.

And strange new longings rise and vaguer mightier dreams
Well in his boundless heart as now through timeless hours
He hears the murmur of the bridged or unbridged streams
And sees the fields alight with a million burning flowers.

Yea, were not this enough? O banded heavens, say,
To have added pain to pain, to have added dreams to toil,
To have slaved in dreams by night as with his hands by day,
To have wakened in his breast the soul's dark serpent-coil?

But dream breeds dream apace and covers all the world

With a fair image prophesying things to be,

And while through heaving time his fragile life is hurled

Audacious man hath paused and dreamt he may be free,

And pondering greatly thus, leapt on his fellow-man;

And wars have scored the earth and the sea drunk her fill,

And marching, ruining armies laid their dusty ban

On harbour, field, and barn, and loftypalaced hill.

If earth had had a heart, surely that heart were glad

To see her pygmy foes squander their blood
in vain,

To see her hills again in her own loose weeds clad,
To see the dams and dykes yield to her high-piled rain.

And still the contest grew, still the dream huger swelled
And with its wings obscured the opening vast abyss,
Till at the last mankind, in noblest fury held, Swayed like two wrestlers locked close to a precipice!

October, 1918.

THE END

I DREAMT that I was standing in a wood Where the trees parted and a ride came through,

Not used by many, for the undergrowth, Saplings five inches high and nettles, spread Across the ruts even to the middle. And On either side the tall trees rose and brambles Looped round the heavy boles their thorny ropes.

Down the long track came slowly a weary rider.

His horse's hooves made no sound in the wood,

They moved so slowly. The horse was bony and old,

With ragged mane and tail and gnarled thin legs
And head that drooped from the loose-hanging reins.

The rider was old and thin, his clothes were shabby,

His saddle scratched and worn, his stirrups dull

And pitted with rust. He held between his hands

Upon the saddle-bow a cup wrapped loosely In old discoloured rags. I could not see What shape it was, or whether of metal or glass,

But as I looked I saw the rider's eyes Bent burning on it. Never on the road
He turned his gaze but still upon the cup He stared and still the horse walked slowly on, Reins hanging on its scraggy neck. I saw Those eyes, so fiercely still, burn on the cup
And round them all the lines of the thin face Grooved by despair and shame that made a victory

Seem like defeat—as joyless. Then behind The rider came a crowd of men and women Who walked the track as soundlessly as he.
Behind the brambles dizzily I stared And half saw some and others not at all,

But all I saw were such as every day Walk about city streets. There were rich men

Glossily dressed, and women in stale rags, Children with smeary faces, dowdy women, Fussily proper, clerks, workmen, and tramps,
And young girls proud still of their pretty bodies

And young men thinking of their games and schoolboys

Carrying books. Thus through the wood they went,

Following the rider, and their trampling boots Fell soundless on the thick-grown track, their breathing

Never disturbed the dust that in the air Rose from the full-blown meadowsweet.

They marched

On and on unending, rank after rank, And still the long grass waved about their feet

Unbroken. In their various faces I Could read nothing. Willing, uncager eyes Followed the rider, fading now from sight.

After them in like procession came A cavalcade of beasts, the homely animals
That live about our houses, dogs and cats
And horses, and the small beasts of the fields, And mixed with them strange unknown tropical things, Flaming tigers and quaint-shaped burrowing brutes, Hopping, leaping, and crawling, and snakes and birds
That hovered in flocks above the track and alighted
And flew again, cuckoo and eagle and dove Mixing together. I gazed between the leaves And still a mist hung heavy on my eyes Blurring these shapes. And when they all were gone
Time paused an instant. Then the trees seemed To drag their long roots slowly from the ground

And follow after, and the bushes too,
And like a swarm of bees the smaller plants, Slender-stalked and starry-leafed, arose And from my face the screen of bramble
 boughs
Suddenly fell; and all in that strange train Swept onward and the earth was black and bare
And I was left alone, unsheltered, unshaded.
I looked around and there was nothing left,
No living thing, man, animal or plant But bleak dead earth where no wind moved, rain fell,
Fire burnt. And still I stood. Then there came slowly
On the same way a figure mountain-high Whose bright horns in the clouds, had there been clouds,
Would have projected. In his hands before him
He held a book, open, which he studied closely,

Walking on soundless feet, with downcast
eyes.

And as he reached the spot where not my body
But now my fleshless spirit stood in terror He paused and raised his head. The thundercloud eyes

Stared up into the blank and colourless heaven

Then down again upon the fatal page.
He closed the volume up. Then there was nothing.

GLASGOW: W. COLLINS SONS AND CO. LTD.

21

2-Stanford University Libraries

3 6105 124 453 296

PR 6037 H33I8
1921

Stanford University Libraries
Stanford, California

Return this book on or before date due.

FANNY BUTCHER & BOOKS
75 EAST ADAMS STREET CHICAGO

